

Understanding International Diplomacy: Theory, Practice and Ethics

Keynote paper presented at the International Workshop Alternative Cultures of Diplomacy, Diplomatic Cultures Research Network, An AHRC-funded Research Network, lead by Fiona McConnell & Jason Dittmer, UNPO/The Hague, Netherlands, November 2013.

(Para)Diplomatic Cultures: Old and New

Noé Comago

The notion of diplomatic culture is generally presented as something belonging exclusively to the semantic field of international relations, completely strange to the complexities of political life within the contours of specific states. In light of this, and against all empirical evidence, diplomatic studies tend to reproduce the fiction of the existence of a perfect and timeless political community – the state – as the foundational assumption that gives sense to the whole diplomatic system. The interplay between domestic complexity and diplomacy is occasionally examined but only to the extent that pluralism could acquire a critical manifestation in the form of intractable inter-communal or ethnic conflict or political violence, driving to secessionism, partition, 'balkanization', ethnic cleansing, and ultimately war (e.g. Campbell 1998). Otherwise, implications for diplomatic representation of domestic pluralism remain ignored. That inclination is even more salient amongst those studies focused on the problems surrounding diplomatic recognition of so-called 'de facto' states (Kingston and Spears 2004, Caspersen 2012). After all, visibility given to these cases is not the result of some intrinsic qualities of the affected territories. Quite the opposite, they only receive diplomatic attention to the extent that they serve as the ultimate pretext for the consequent deployment of a variety of 'rituals of mediation' by external powers with conflicting interests (cfr. Debrix and Weber 2003).
